

Steve Caley has played an integral role within the nuclear industry for over 15 years, driving strategy, growth and success within each UK PLC business that he has worked.

Previously Steve has worked within government as a 'nuclear expert' advising and shaping policy, improving exports and inward investments, working within the NIC, leading industry trade missions and internationally renowned conferences. Steve is working with Jacobs, a major global nuclear company operating worldwide. Jacobs is on a transformational journey and as a Strategy and Development Director - he comes with vast experience and insight into the evolving nuclear industry within the UK and abroad.

As he has watched the nuclear industry develop over the past two decades, he has never been more excited about the potential of the industry than right now.

He believes that the key events that the UK is facing right now through COVID and BREXIT will give the industry challenges, but through these challenges he believes that the industry will come through stronger. The gauntlet set down through the Nuclear Sector Deal for 20% cost savings within Decommissioning by 2030, 40% women in Nuclear by 2030 and £2bn domestic and international contract wins, although tough, are not unachievable if the industry can come together and reimagine the future as a whole.

Within public perception, now more than ever, nuclear has its role to play. The UK's commitment to "net zero" greenhouse gases by 2050, gives the nuclear industry an exciting mandate for the future. This mandate does not only impact the New Build sector but also gives renewed emphasis on "getting decommissioning done" to deal with our legacy and free up valuable sites for their next phase. The existing generation fleet also has strategic management options ahead that will impact the UK supply chain.

These movements all lead to changes within the industry that need to be embraced. The future needs to be different and will be different for many nuclear stakeholders.

With Steve's unique ability in being able to see opportunities and innovative ways of thinking, generating ideas that inspire, differentiate and succeed, as well as being able to bring specialists and teams together to take advantage of these innovative opportunities, he believes he is well placed to Chair the DEG group at this current and influential time.

He is of the opinion that through sector groups like this, the industry collaboratively can influence a positive future for us all.

If selected be the chair of DEG he will drive the following:

- Re-imagining the future role that the industry can play within the sector.
- Promote innovative options that supports the UK's priorities.
- Ensure delivery on promises and commitments.
- Above all act with Equality and Integrity.

Steve Caley

Steve.Caley@Jacobs.com

07976 352 265

